KEYS

lions, an alligator, nurse sharks, stingrays, a sea turtle and parrots. Created in 1946 by the P.F. McKenney family, which still owns and operates the attraction, Theater of the Sea pumps in 12 million gallons of ocean water a day to maintain the three-acre natural salt-water lagoons. While the theater has a list of “animal interactions” for extra fees, you can opt to pay general admission to watch the dolphin, sea lion and parrot shows, take a short boat ride, lounge on the lagoon-side beach and take a fish and reptile tour that includes alligators.

● Robbie's Marina: No trip through the Upper Keys is complete without a stop to feed the tarpon. Robbie's Marina of Islamorada offers charter fishing trips, parasailing, boat and kayak rentals along with a restaurant and open-air market. But it's the chance to feed tarpon by hand at Robbie's that makes it a classic Keys roadside attraction. A school of more than 100 tarpon hang out at the marina for hours, according to Robbie's, and occasionally one of the “silver kings” will emerge from the water to grab some tossed fish. There's a dock access fee, and you'll also pay for a bucket of fish.

● Dolphins Research Center: The Dolphin Research Center on Grassy Key is dedicated to learning and teaching about dolphins and is licensed by the federal government to help manatees in distress. It also welcomes people to spend a couple of hours or the day on the grounds or pay to swim with a dolphin. Higher ticket options include a chance to shadow dolphin trainers, or spend half a day with the dolphins and sea lions. General admission allows you to watch.

● Pigeon Key: At just five acres, this island beneath the “Old” Seven Mile Bridge in Marathon sure is tiny. But it played a huge role in Keys history. This is where hundreds of workers bunked while building Henry Flagler's Key West extension of the Florida East Coast Railway, which connected the Keys to mainland Florida. Pigeon Key's grounds and buildings date back to 1908. These days, the buildings are used for marine science education programs. But you can still visit Pigeon Key. Tours, which have an admission price and last about an hour, are available. You'll take a ferry from the visitor center at mile marker 47.5.
